MalwareBytes Anti-Malware Premium.Hot Topics: A campus that never sleeps is coming to a college near you The Lowell Sun Posted: 08/06/2016 11:22:09 AM EDT By Christopher S. Rugaber, The Associated Press Updated: 08/06/2016 12:42:16 PM EDT (NEW YORK) -- The world of higher education is about to get a little more colorful, as colleges and universities across the country start offering classes and even degrees remotely, after Congress stepped in to rescue them from a cut in federal aid money. More than 40 schools have announced plans to offer distance learning to their students, and several are fielding questions from would-be students about the prospect. Nearly half of the colleges and universities in the U.S. now offer at least some distance learning, and the federal government is offering generous incentives to encourage more schools to move online. It's a dramatic shift, especially considering that just a few decades ago nearly all education came through the classroom. "The only time we were ever together was at the university. The rest of my life was spent at home," said Regina Preker, who is preparing to start her first year of community college. Preker, 26, of Lewiston, Maine, says she would love to be able to take a few classes online while her child is still young. But she doesn't qualify for financial aid and can't afford the $3,000 in annual tuition at Community College of Rhode Island. At the University of Michigan, which plans to offer classes and degrees online for the first time, about 600 students had signed up for distance education, out of a student population of 160,000, by the end of the summer. Advertisement At least 10 other schools have made distance learning their main focus in the 2016-17 academic year. Efforts to offer online courses began in the 1980s, after technology became cheap enough. But those early efforts focused largely on higher education, because the risk to students was so high and the impact on professors so great. The first accredited online university, the University of Phoenix, was founded in 1984, and the following year
